Now is connected to.Brettinwood Brettinwood (also spelled Brettinwarth and Breteineu) is an archaeological site in Dumfries and Galloway in Scotland, in the Southern Upland area. It lies on the modern A74 (previously the A70) approximately 3 km south of Kirkoswald. It is a vitrified fort, almost certainly ancient, perhaps dating from the Iron Age. It is the best known and best preserved of a series of forts built along the southern edge of the Cheviots in the middle of the first century BC, a fort built and then immediately overbuilt by a second, far bigger fort, and then finally abandoned shortly before, or contemporaneously with, the arrival of Rome. Archaeology Brettinwood is located in the middle of the Cheviots. This is a strategic position in ancient times, a hill which dominated the landscape with a commanding view in all directions. The fort is rectangular, with a single, ditched rampart of about 13 to 14 m wide with approximately 250 m², or approximately 20,000 square metres. There are some indications that there may have originally been a timber palisade added at the western end of the fort. There is evidence for a small Roman fort on the site, called Brettincythe (to the north of the main site). This was built to occupy the position, and was similar to the fortress at Alnwick, and was built in the early years of the 1st century BC. The defences at Brettincythe were built of turf which has been fired, a technique used by the Romans to increase the effectiveness of their fortifications. About 50 m from the entrance of the fort lies a burial mound (about 16 m in diameter). It has been suggested that this represents an Iron Age "village-type settlement" with a palisade and ditch. The shape of the graves suggests that they might have been artificially positioned, and archaeologists have suggested that the bodies were put in a hole in the ground and then filled with stones, rubble,
